Millionaires sour on US economy

Investors brace for the end of the bull market

Jessica Menton
USA TODAY

Millionaires are the most cautious they've been on the direction of the economy since the years leading up to the global financial crisis.

Investor sentiment on the economy for the next 12 months dropped 14 points from a year ago to -7, its lowest level since 2006, according to Fidelity Investments' annual Millionaire Outlook Confidence Index. That marked its lowest level since the index began that same year.

Fidelity's 11th Millionaire Outlook Study surveyed 2,026 investors, including 1,102 millionaires and 924 investors that Fidelity calls the "millionaires of tomorrow." The study focused on five measures for its confidence index: the economy, the stock market, real estate values and consumer and business spending. The outlook wasn't taken in 2007, 2011 and 2015.

The latest data signal that some wealthy investors are skittish about the longevity of the 10-year economic expansion, even as job creation remains robust and stocks touch record highs.

"Investors have seen such a positive run in the economy and the stock market since the Great Recession," said David Canter, head of the registered investment adviser segment at Fidelity Clearing & Custody Solutions. "The lower outlook is a function of investors wondering when this ride is going to slow down."

The survey was conducted in August during a turbulent third quarter as stocks came under pressure because of recession fears. To be sure, recent signs have pointed to a strong U.S. economy; job creation strengthened in November, and unemployment fell to a half-century low.

There wasn't a clear reason why some Wall Street pros have grown skeptical.

GETTY IMAGES/ISTOCKPHOTO

Fidelity's study revealed that investors' confidence in their personal finances has dimmed as their concerns mount about where the stock market is headed, their retirement savings and their debt management, according to the survey.

Some money managers said they scaled back exposure to risky assets such as stocks after prices increased to all-time highs in recent months.

"It's been a hell of a year," said Brian Sterz, portfolio manager at Los Angeles-based Miracle Mile Advisors. "We're waiting for stocks to cheapen up, and they inevitably will."

Concerns about health were the leading causes of stress for millionaires and non-millionaires alike. More than one-third of investors polled by Fidelity have health-related worries, which accounted for the largest proportion of their overall stress.

Health care costs continue to rise. A 65-year old couple retiring in 2019 can expect to spend $285,000 in health care and medical expenses throughout retirement, compared with $280,000 in 2018, according to Fidelity's annual Retiree Health Care Cost Estimate. For single retirees, the health care cost estimate is $150,000 for women and $135,000 for men, the data show.

"People are living longer and retiring earlier," Canter said. "Paying for health care is a top financial concern for investors of all asset levels."

"Investors have seen such a positive run in the economy and the stock market since the Great Recession. The lower outlook is a function of investors wondering when this ride is going to slow down."

Joy to the work: Tips for office gift-giving

Charisse Jones
USA TODAY

A faulty bulb knocked out an entire string of lights on your Christmas tree. You can't find that hot toy your nephew wanted anywhere. And you don't know when you'll have the time to clean the house before holiday guests arrive.

What else could go wrong?
How about you have to buy a gift for your office pod mate, and you don't have a clue what to get her?

Many workers feel the prospect of buying presents for their colleagues adds yet another layer of pressure to an already stressful season.

A LinkedIn survey found that 31% of employees say they feel they have to add co-workers to their gift-giving lists, and 40% wish their company would say gift-giving is off-limits.

A lot of the tension stems from not knowing what to buy. If your father-in-law doesn't like the sweater you bought him, there may be an awkward silence at the dinner table, but giving an inappropriate gift to a colleague or boss could have consequences.

Horror stories abound. Philippe Weiss, president of the workplace legal compliance consultancy Seyfarth at Work, says he heard about one manager who gave his sales team bamboo toothbrushes. The recipients interpreted the gift as a dig at their oral hygiene.

An employee at another company put her job in peril when she gifted her boss with a book on how to be a better manager.

To avoid such faux pas, it makes sense for companies to put a gift policy in place so employees know what is and isn't acceptable. If your workplace doesn't set parameters, here are some tips from Weiss:

Don't buy gifts that can be deemed too intimate. Anything worn close to the body, from clothes to perfume, should be avoided, along with invites on excursions – such as a wine tasting – that could be seen as more romantic than collegial.

Don't shop for the boss. It might be tempting to deliver a little extra holiday cheer to your managers, but generally, they probably shouldn't accept. It's best to not put them in a position to have to say, "Thanks, but no thanks."

Don't make everyone chip in for a group gift. When people are spending on everything from decorations to extra towels for visiting relatives, it's a good idea to allow members of your team to make their own decision on whether to contribute to the pot.

Don't give cash. That, and even gift cards, could be taxed as income, Weiss says.

Do encourage "Secret Santa." Let employees who want to participate pick names randomly. Then come up with gift suggestions, and set a budget so no one breaks the bank.

Do split the bounty. If a client sends over a giant plate of cookies or other treat, share it with your office mates. Don't forget to include the mail-room and maintenance staff.

Do consider giving to the community. Instead of having employees pick out picture frames and candles for their peers, why not donate as an office to a cause?
