Rolling Stone's Wenner lived alongside the A-list

Melissa Ruggieri
USA TODAY

When your 60th birthday party attendees include David Bowie, Bruce Springsteen, Bette Midler, Robin Williams and Al Gore, the anecdotes will be plentiful.

And Jann Wenner's memoir, the obviously and aptly named "Like a Rolling Stone" (Little, Brown, 592 pp.), doesn't shirk the storytelling.

For more than five decades, Wenner, 76, lived the life of a rock star. Vicariously, yes. But as the co-founder of Rolling Stone magazine in 1967 and later an integral anchor of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, the friendships with entertainment luminaries from Bono to Bob Dylan to John Belushi became genuine relationships. Of course, these were fostered during the years when access to performers meant being invited to John Lennon's house for hourslong chats and going boating with Mick Jagger. The current journalistic realities of 10-minute phone interviews and 30 seconds on a red carpet to create Instagram Reels, this was not.

As the impresarios of Rolling Stone, Wenner and magazine co-founder Ralph J. Gleason also were responsible for discovering and showcasing the writing and reporting of Hunter S. Thompson, Tom Wolfe, Cameron Crowe and Jon Landau (who would depart to manage Springsteen) as well as photographer Annie Leibovitz, now as iconic as some of her subjects.

Wenner's memoir zigzags from Los Angeles to London to San Francisco to New York; follows his 1967 marriage to Jane Schindelheim and simultaneous homosexual dalliances (Wenner has been with partner Matt Nye since 1995); and name-drops a constellation of stars from the lands of music, politics and Hollywood.

It's a wildly entertaining romp that will stir feelings of envy and exhaustion. Here are five revelations.

No love from Led Zeppelin

One of the most revered rock bands in music history "hated" the magazine, and guitarist Jimmy Page blamed Wenner for a "dismissive" review of 1969's debut release, "Led Zeppelin." An interview request was refused "with animosity." Crowe had been assigned the story, and Wenner promised the budding writer the cover if he could somehow land the interviews. Led Zeppelin – including Page – eventually acquiesced out of fondness for Crowe.

Mick Jagger, publisher?

In 1969, Wenner and Jagger agreed to create a British version of Rolling Stone. Jagger wanted the European model to have its own voice and writers. "Mick found offices, put together a staff and it was underway. He was now in the magazine business and I was in the Mick Jagger business, and I would stay in that business for life," Wenner writes. But after visiting the British office and finding it "uninspiring, loosely run and haphazard," Wenner shut down the operation after less than a year. Jagger paid off the bills, the employees' salaries and their severance.

Mourning John Lennon

Wenner, a friend of Lennon's, was bereft at the news of the music icon's 1980 murder. Falling into work mode, Wenner called Leibovitz to dispatch her to New York's Dakota building, where Lennon was shot to death ("even though she didn't want to," Wenner recalls). During a week of depression that "this great man at the center of everything" was gone, Wenner listened to "Double Fantasy" in his dark office and taped an NBC News special to discuss Lennon's impact. Ono, Lennon's widow, saw the interview and invited Wenner to the Dakota the next day.

Ono "gave me an account of the killer calling out John's name and then the gun coming out ... She had John's glasses with dried blood on them. She wanted me to look at them and hold them."

A dance with Michael Jackson

The enigmatic King of Pop requested dinner with Wenner as an audition to determine whether he'd agree to a cover interview.

Jackson "reminded me of Andy Warhol, a soft voice, sometimes a whisper, with a lot of 'gee whiz,' saying little, asking a lot and listening closely," Wenner says. A date was set for an official interview at Neverland Ranch, with Jackson requesting it take place "at night, no lights on, just the fireplace and candles."

After weeks of preparation – including taking Diana Ross to lunch, only to learn she "barely knew" Jackson – Wenner received the call he was expecting: Jackson canceled, saying he was "too nervous" to sit for the interview.

Tom Cruise, Angelina Jolie

Wenner acknowledges being captivated by Cruise and his "unnaturally dazzling" smile. The actor's focus was impressive; his presence warm. A brief meeting with his mother and sister and a tour of the Scientology center was included in their interview.

And yet, "in the end, he said nothing; he thoroughly deflects ... all you know is that here is a confident and extremely polite man."

In 1985, Wenner dovetailed the success of Rolling Stone into the acquisition of US Weekly.

Always in competition with People magazine, Wenner was vigilant in unearthing celebrity scoops.

A bit of luck arrived when a photographer who worked for Us Weekly received a tip that Jolie was on a secret trip to Africa with Brad Pitt, who was married to Jennifer Aniston at the time.

The tipster "specified a time and place where they walked and suggested we could 'secretly' do a photo ambush." The photographer got the visual evidence of the debut of Brangelina. The tipster was Jolie.

Yatra

da-written "Dos Oruguitas," which was up for original song. Yatra calls it "life-changing."

Now, he's basking in it as he crosses state lines in a tour bus.

Question: How do you take care of yourself mentally and physically while you're on tour?

Answer: I lead a pretty healthy lifestyle ... I train every day, I'm eating healthy, and my mind is in a good place. I read and I also talk to my psychologist once a week. I give my personal well-being and my emotions a very important place. I give them that priority that is necessary – not only as a singer but in general.

You don't box yourself in within a genre and your discography – pop, reggaeton, ballads and flamenco – is proof. Have you ever felt pressured to change your sound?

I have at some points done things that aren't really my essence. But then I realize it's not the way to go because people don't believe it too much when I have done the type of songs that just don't flow with (my style). It's important for it to happen because it's a reminder, "Hey, man, just follow your heart."

How do you stay true to yourself?

I try to not go as fast as the rest of the world or look side to side (to what others are doing). It's about focusing on your own things, enjoying them and having fun.

If you're living like you're lacking something, it's because you're doing your tours and you're seeing your songs having great success but then you're (checking) what other artists are having more success than you. Then you're like, "Why is this person achieving more than me?" That's not good, that's when you can get consumed by this industry or by life in general.

You grew up in Miami and are fluent in English, but you mainly sing in Spanish.

I always knew I wanted to sing in Spanish. It was my calling. It's where I'm from. I think and sleep in Spanish. I grew up listening to a lot of Spanish music and I wanted to write (music) in Spanish and so I decided to leave the U.S., go back to Colombia and start there. It's been the best decision I've made in my life. It's connected me with my Colombian culture and with so many other cultures of Latin America. I feel like I have a lot to offer.

Now, if I decide to sing in English, it'll have a lot of that culture, passion, love and spark from Latin America. I am bicultural ... a huge blessing.

How did it feel to sing "Dos Oruguitas" at the Oscars?

It's like one of those dreams you have that you wake up from thinking, "How was that a dream?" This was literally that dream. Everything I could have wished for happened.

In such a magical way (I was) representing the 600 million Spanish-speaking people in the world, our culture, our way of feeling, our way of thinking, and representing my country. And our land, our customs, our food and our love – "Encanto" has done such a beautiful job of painting a beautiful picture of Colombia for the world.

Bowie

"Daydream" spotlights his keen intellect. Whether delving into bisexuality during interviews in the '70s – a taboo topic amplified by Bowie sitting in full Ziggy Stardust regalia – or waxing philosophical ("The person who craves a lot of affection isn't particularly good at giving it," he says of the strained relationship with his mother), Bowie is sharp and insightful.

Morgen, who calls himself an "intellectual midget" compared with Bowie, shares that

The artistic side of David Bowie is spotlighted in the film "Moonage Daydream."

PROVIDED BY NEON

he suffered a near-fatal heart attack in January 2017 at the age of 48, just as he began work on the film.

That summer, "I started listening to Bowie and realized he was basically providing a roadmap as to how to lead a balanced and fulfilling life," Morgen says. "For a time, I was learning how to live again. It was a bit of a resurrection."

The gift of Bowie's inspiration prodded Morgen to continue on his odyssey, in which he didn't try to explain Bowie to the masses, but instead allowed his music and art to resonate, however fans choose to embrace it.

"I've had an incredible life," Bowie says late in the film, reflecting on his accomplishments. "I'd love to do it again."
