Football team, league switch keep Colorado chancellor busy

Brent Schrottenboer
USA TODAY

BOULDER, Colorado – Phil DiStefano has had quite a year as chancellor of the University of Colorado Boulder. Since early December, he has:

- Hired Deion Sanders as his head football coach.
- Decided to have Colorado leave the Pac-12 after 13 years, helping contribute to the league’s collapse.
- Decided to rejoin the Big 12 Conference after leaving it in 2011.
- More recently, he’s watched his university’s football team become arguably the biggest story in American sports after starting the season 2-0 under Sanders, including a big win against Nebraska last Saturday at Folsom Field.

USA TODAY Sports interviewed him about all of this and more in his office on campus the day before that home opener.

Is Colorado putting too many eggs in Sanders’ basket? Didn’t the Pac-12’s presidents and chancellors turn down a good deal last year that could have kept the league together? And why did he pull the plug on the Pac-12 before he even knew for sure what the league could offer Colorado in revenue-sharing for the future?

“I could have been wrong,” DiStefano said. To be clear, sports is not his primary focus. He’s a lifelong educator who has been in charge of the campus as chancellor since 2009, including athletics. But the Buffaloes have grabbed national headlines recently, leading both ESPN and Fox Sports to send their Saturday game-day shows to Boulder this week. “60 Minutes” is coming to town, too, according to a recent video published by Sanders’ son Deion Jr. All want to capitalize on the big viewership numbers being delivered by “Coach Prime” after he took over a team that finished 1-11 last year.

Colorado’s big bet on Sanders: ‘Why not?’

Before the season, the university even filmed a nationally televised commercial that promotes CU Boulder by showcasing it as a “Prime” destination with “Coach Prime” on board. DiStefano appears in the ad at the end, noting the campus has a “Prime location” with its scenic backdrop.

But there were no guarantees Sanders would be successful when they filmed this advertisement for the university. He hadn’t even coached a game yet. Skeptics might question whether Colorado has placed too many eggs in Sanders’ basket, which could fall and break in an unpredictable sport.

DiStefano sees it differently. “Yeah, I think for this first year, why not?” DiStefano said. “I mean, it’s the biggest story in sports, not only in college sports. In sports. So why not?”

Why they ditched the Pac-12

DiStefano and his athletic director, Rick George, had decided they couldn’t wait forever on the Pac-12 to give them concrete projections for what the league could provide them in revenue under a new media rights deal starting next year.

So they bailed and signed a grant-of-rights agreement with the Big 12 that lasts through June 2031.

He previously told USA TODAY Sports he would wait to see the numbers from the Pac-12 before making any decision and even expressed confidence that the Pac-12 would rank third among the Power Five conferences in revenue sharing.

All that changed in July, when Colorado faced a decision: Take a concrete offer from the Big 12 to join as a full member with a $31.7 million share of media rights revenue. Or keep waiting on the Pac-12 to show them the money.

“I was chancellor when we moved to the Pac-12 (in 2011), and it was one of the things I wanted to do, but personally I couldn’t see a deal in the Pac-12 coming through of any significance,” he said. “I could have been wrong.”

Did he see any numbers from the Pac-12 before deciding to leave?

“Actually, I didn’t,” he said.

Wasn’t it a risk to leave before then?

He said he could have been wrong because there was still a possibility the Pac-12 could strike a deal with a major television partner such as ESPN. It did not, but DiStefano didn’t know that for sure at the time that he made the decision to leave. All he knew for sure was Colorado football coach Deion Sanders has the Buffaloes off to a 2-0 start after beating Nebraska.

RON CHENOY/USA TODAY SPORTS

that the Big 12 was offering a TV package with ESPN and Fox Sports.

“What we knew was what the Big 12 could offer and that ESPN could pick up any, if it’s a Power Five conference team, their share,” he said. “And Fox, it would be negotiated with the Big 12. And we were confident about that just because it was Colorado and having Coach Prime (Sanders).”

What did he know at the time about Pac-12?

After Colorado decided to leave the Pac-12, the league showed remaining members a potential deal with Apple that would stream Pac-12 games on its subscription service. It was unconventional and raised questions about whether the league’s schools would lose visibility if they moved away from traditional linear TV companies such as ESPN. Did DiStefano know at the time that the Pac-12 deal would not focus on linear TV?

“Well, no, because I believed there were still discussions going on with linear. But I think that’s where the risk (for Colorado) might have come in. But again, I think the stability outweighed the risk.”

The cost of realignment

Stability was the main reason Colorado left the Pac-12. After Colorado left, Arizona, Arizona State and Utah made the same decision to ditch the uncertain future of the Pac-12 for certain linear contract terms with the Big 12.

Washington and Oregon also decided to leave the Pac-12 for the Big Ten, forcing their athletes into a series of cross-country trips to Big Ten destinations in the Midwest and East instead of shorter trips in the West with the Pac-12. Similar long-distance travel awaits California and Stanford, which since decided to bail on the Pac-12 for the Atlantic Coast Conference based in North Carolina.

“It’s definitely going to be difficult on student-athletes,” DiStefano said of those schools. “Personally, what I would hope is the presidents and chancellors in the ACC and Big Ten, and athletic directors in those two conferences, really look at some creative scheduling so that these students aren’t flying to Rutgers one weekend and flying back to Indiana or Ohio State the second one.”

Colorado doesn’t face that problem by rejoining the Big 12, because DiStefano said its travel distances won’t change much.

What do you think of the Pac-12’s demise?

Only two Pac-12 teams remain for 2024: Oregon State and Washington State. “It’s confirmation of how college sports are changing,” he said.

Is it progress?

“Probably progress in some ways,” he said. “In some ways, kind of in the middle.”

Who’s to blame for what happened to Pac-12?

“I’m not in the blame game at all. The presidents and chancellors in this case, No. 1 they do what’s good for their institutions. And I don’t know (USC president Carol Folt’s) motivation or (UCLA chancellor) Gene Block’s motivation. My motivation was stability for our student-athletes, making sure they had the opportunity to be on ESPN, Fox.”
