Felix off, running on off-track pursuits

Josh Peter
USA TODAY

LOS ANGELES – In what was billed as the last race of her professional career, Allyson Felix lost.

But she was beaming again even before she regained her breath.

The race, held Sunday on a 100-meter track in downtown LA, culminated The Allyson Felix Race For Change, an event presented by sportswear company Athleta and aimed at raising awareness for the importance of child care and equity for women.

Felix, grabbing a microphone moments after finishing second in her final race, referred to Athleta when she said, “You guys asked me how I wanted to go out, and I said in my dream world running in the streets of LA with all of my people.”

Spectators cheered as Felix, who was born and raised in the LA area, continued, “It’s been a joy this entire day just hanging out with everyone.”

But not all joy. Ashley Henderson said she felt a tinge of guilt after beating Felix in the 100, which capped the daylong activities that drew a crowd that included Felix’s parents, older brother, husband and daughter. Hundreds of people came largely to see Felix, the most decorated American track and field athlete in Olympic history.

But it was Henderson, a sprinter from St. Louis, who won the last race in 11.46 seconds. Felix finished in 11.66 and Chloe Abbott, a sprinter from Michigan, finished third in 12.34. The heat featured only those three sprinters on the five-lane street track.

“I know this is her event and all about her and it still is despite who came to the line first or not,” Henderson said.

Earlier in the day, Felix had helped her 3-year-old daughter, Camryn, into the starting blocks for the first time. Later, with Camryn wearing sparkly gold shoes, mother and daughter ran down the track together. Albeit slowly, and at one point Allyson Felix grabbing her daughter’s right hand and guiding her across the finish line.

No one seemed concerned that Camryn finished last on a day that offered a glimpse into the next phase of Allyson Felix’s life, as other mothers and daughters ran on the same track at

About three weeks ago, Felix ran the last race of her competitive career – winning a bronze medal in the mixed-gender 4x400-meter relay at the world championships. Now she was running with a different purpose and focus.

After Camryn crossed the finish line, Allyson Felix guided her into a VIP tent, got her water and snacks and plopped down next to her on a comfy couch.

“Just being a mother has really just put me down a different path and one I didn’t expect, I guess,” Felix, 36, later told USA TODAY Sports. “It’s just being more thoughtful and definitely shifted things from always being laser focused on a specific goal all the time to thinking about the way I want Cammy to grow up, and I think that inspires me to do different things and make different choices.”

The biggest recent choice: retirement from track.

“I think it probably hasn’t even hit yet, what it’s actually going to be,” she said. “This year has been really emotional, and it’s been hard coming to the realization that it’s time for me to walk away. But because I have been doing this for the last 20 years, there is a loss of this thing that I absolutely love to do and that I’m so passionate about.

“I’ve talked to other athletes who’ve gone down that path, and I think it’s just going to be something I’m going to have to figure out, even though I have my next great challenges and I have all the things lined up, that I’m going to be doing. But I think it’s more of an emotional thing, like a loss.”

Might it be time to start raising her own track star in Camryn? After all, Kenny Ferguson, Camryn’s father and Allyson’s husband, is a former sprinter who won three gold medals at the 2003 Pan American Junior Championships.

“I’m kind of pushing her in different directions,” Felix said. “Yeah, it maybe selfishly, but I’ve been to so many track meets. I would love to see her maybe play tennis or golf or maybe do something different. But obviously whatever she wants to do, I will be supportive.”

Felix also is thinking of her own future, and it will involve more than parenting. She said a primary focus will be her footwear company, Saysh. She also noted she recently joined the International Olympic Committee Athletes’ Commission and said, “So I’m excited to hopefully have some impact there, just continue to try to do some of that.”

It’s unlikely you’ll see her coaching anytime soon after years of working with coach Bobby Kersee.

“I blame Bobby that I’m not the next Bobby,” Felix said with a smile. “I’m like, ‘The pain that you have inflicted on my life.’ I think what’s he’s really left me with, him and Jackie (Joyner Kersee), is like the role of mentorship, and what that looks like.

“I don’t have that coaching bug right now. But I want to help the next generation. I want to share my experience and help them along the way. In that way I do want to be active.”

She already is giving back by providing child care – which she understood was essential after giving birth to her daughter in 2018 and eight months later traveling as she prepared for the Tokyo Olympics in 2021.

Before the Tokyo Olympics, Felix and Athleta committed $200,000 to help fund child care costs for mothers who are also athletes while they are traveling to competitions. In June, she provided free child care to fellow athletes at the USA Track & Field Outdoor Championship in Eugene, Oregon.

“The dream is for that to be the norm at all events,” she said. “And obviously that’s going to take a lot of work to get that in place, but that’s where I want to see that going, and just finding ways to be thoughtful and supporting women in general.”

NCAA shows it’s spineless with ban silence

Nancy Armour
Columnist
USA TODAY

The NCAA is as cowardly as it is inept.

Asked Sunday for its reaction to the near total abortion ban passed this weekend in Indiana, where the NCAA is based, spokeswoman Michelle Hosick said, “We are declining comment.”

That’s right. An organization that last year had more than 240 women at its headquarters, comprising more than half of its staff, is choosing to stay silent as their rights are ripped away from them.

An organization whose sole purpose is to support and facilitate participation for college athletes, nearly half of whom are female, is OK with those women being deemed less than full citizens.

An organization that already struggles to do right by women is standing by as their health and well-being are put at risk.

An organization that is supposed to support women and help them achieve success, in college athletics and beyond, is giving its de facto approval as their futures are restricted by extremist Indiana legislators who see them as nothing more than incubators.

Spineless as this is, it’s also short-sighted by the NCAA.

As the voters of Kansas reminded lawmakers who have rushed to strip women of their rights in the wake of Roe v. Wade being overturned, the majority of Americans support abortion access. They believe complex medical and personal decisions should be left to a woman and her doctor.

As right-wing legislators get further and further out of step with the American public, there will be a price to pay.

“We are concerned that this law will hinder Lilly’s – and Indiana’s – ability to attract diverse scientific engineering and business talent from around the world,” pharmaceutical company Eli Lilly, one of Indiana’s largest employers, said in a statement after the abortion ban passed.

It won’t be any different for the NCAA. Imagine trying to sell a young woman on working for the NCAA at its headquarters in Indianapolis. Or a man with teenage daughters. Or anyone who believes women, not state legislators, know what is best for them and their bodies.

Imagine trying to convince a sponsor that has publicly stated its support for abortion rights, or one whose target audience is women, to partner with the NCAA.

That the NCAA should be hostile to women shouldn’t come as a surprise. The new chair of its board of governors is Linda Livingstone, president of Baylor, a conservative Baptist school. The presidents of Georgia, Georgetown and Minot State University are also on the board.

Even before the new board members assumed their duties last week, the NCAA had made it clear it had lost any spine it once had.

When Indiana passed legislation in March 2015 that allowed businesses to discriminate against gays and lesbians, the NCAA joined other Indiana business leaders in condemnation of it. NCAA President Mark Emmert even suggested it could affect Indianapolis’ ability to host lucrative events like the men’s and women’s basketball tournaments.

When North Carolina passed its so-called “bathroom bill” targeting transgender people, the NCAA responded by saying it would no longer hold championships – including the men’s and women’s basketball tournaments – there.

But as Texas and other states have passed laws that are increasingly hostile to women, the NCAA has barely said a peep.

Texas passed a bounty law last year that effectively curtailed abortion access in that state, yet the state will host both the men’s and women’s Final Fours next year. And the men’s Final Four again in 2025.

Mississippi, whose law banning abortions after 15 weeks led to the overturning of Roe in June, hosted a softball super regional the month before the Supreme Court issued its decision.

Aside from being the right thing to do, opposing Indiana’s abortion ban also would have been the easy thing to do. Lilly, the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce and other business leaders had already issued strong statements criticizing it. All the NCAA had to do was join the chorus.

Instead, it is conspicuous by its silence.

In saying nothing about Indiana’s abortion ban, the NCAA tells everything about itself. And none of it should make anyone who works there proud.
