Nurses in Minnesota strike over pay and staff shortages

Nursing group calls for federal action amid gains

Ken Alltucker
USA TODAY

About 15,000 nurses in Minnesota walked off the job this week to demand better pay and more robust staffing they say is desperately needed to improve patient care.

Nurses at seven hospitals in the Minneapolis and Duluth metro regions halted work Monday in what the union says is the largest strike ever by private-sector nurses. The hospitals recruited temporary nurses to maintain most services during the three-day strike.

One of Wisconsin's largest hospitals narrowly averted a strike when negotiating teams representing nurses and UW Health hospital announced a proposed settlement Sunday. More than 4,000 nurses in Michigan this month authorized a strike over what they described as unfair labor practices.

The strikes punctuate workforce shortages that worsened during the coronavirus pandemic as nurses navigated safety risks to care for Americans in crowded hospital wings. Now, nurses are fed up after years of being overworked and underpaid — conditions they say jeopardize patient care.

The American Nurses Association, which urged the Biden administration last year to declare a national nurse staffing crisis to fix the “unsustainable nurse staffing shortage facing our country,” reiterated a call for federal action.

Although the nation added 48,000 health care workers over the past year in hospitals, doctors offices and nursing homes, the number of Americans with health care jobs still falls below pre-pandemic levels, the Bureau of Labor Statistics says.

“The challenges that we highlighted around the fatigue and the mental well-being of nurses continue to this day,” said Zina Gontscharow, a senior policy adviser at the American Nurses Association. “Nurses are really feeling a lot of stress with not having adequate (staffing) on the floor, overtime and long shifts.”

Kelley Anaas, an intensive care unit nurse at Abbott Northwestern Hospital in Minneapolis, said the pandemic strained working conditions. She said nurses in her wing typically must cover two patients at a time, a challenge when critically ill patients need constant monitoring.

“We’re doing twice as much work essentially for the same compensation and with fewer resources,” said Anaas, who has worked at the hospital 14 years.

‘Vicious cycle of low morale’

On Monday, nurses began walking the picket line at 7 a.m. outside Children’s Hospital in Minneapolis, one of 15 hospitals affected. Clad in the red T-shirts of the Minnesota Nurses Association and carrying signs with such slogans as “Something has got to give,” several said their chief concern was patient safety.

Nurses picket outside North Memorial Hospital in Robbinsdale, Minn., on Monday as thousands launched a strike, pressing for salary increases. AP

“We’re doing twice as much work essentially for the same compensation and with fewer resources.”

Tracey Dittich, 50, a registered nurse at the hospital for nearly 24 years, said nurses are tired of “hospital administrators and managers that are telling us to do more.” The hospitals need more nurses and more support staff, and higher pay will help, she said.

Union spokesman Sam Fetting said the nurses chose a three-day strike, rather than an open-ended walkout, out of concern for patients.

The hospitals have offered a 10% to 12% wage increase over three years, but nurses are seeking more than 30%. Hospital leaders called their wage demands unaffordable, noting that Allina and Fairview hospitals have posted operating losses and that the cost of wage increases would be passed to patients.

“The union rejected all requests for mediation and held fast to wage demands that were unrealistic, unreasonable and unaffordable,” said several of the Twin Cities hospitals under strike in a joint statement.

The statement said people with emergencies should continue to call 911 or go to emergency rooms. People may see some delay in being treated, it said, despite staffing hospitals with “experienced nurse managers, trained replacement nurses and some existing traveler nurses.”

The COVID-19 pandemic exacerbated longstanding nursing workforce challenges, said Patricia Pittman, a George Washington University professor and director of the Fitzhugh Mullan Institute for Health Workforce Equity.

Though unions have authorized a handful of strikes, she said most of the nation’s nine major nursing unions are willing to negotiate with hospital administrators rather than halt work. And nurses in swaths of the country are not unionized, Pittman said.

But she said nurses probably sympathize with the hard-bargaining tactics employed by aggressive unions seeking better pay and staffing.

“It’s symptomatic of something that is felt among the entire nurse workforce, not just those that are unionized,” Pittman said.

Hospitals used pandemic relief money from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to hire travel nurses from staffing agencies who often were paid more than nurses employed by hospitals. Some nurses quit their hospital jobs for more lucrative travel nursing positions.

Because hospitals have struggled to staff facilities during the pandemic, many hospital nurses have become frustrated over pay and bad morale.

“You’re creating basically a vicious cycle of low morale of the people who stayed behind,” Pittman said. “They’re fundamentally angry about being put in a position where they could lose their license and patients could die because there are not enough nurses.”

Anaas cited surveys predicting many nurses plan to leave bedside care. Elsevier Health, which provides health research and analytics, reported 47% of U.S. nurses and physicians planned to leave their position within two to three years.

She said her fellow Minnesota nurses are striking to call attention to hospital administrators about demands for better staffing and pay, factors that will improve patient care, she said.

“What’s driving this is just like fear for the future of our profession,” Anaas said. “When we’re out here fighting for better contract language, improved working conditions, improved compensation, it’s about making nursing a desirable profession — a profession that people can stay in for an entire career. “Right now, it isn’t.”

DOJ charges 3 Iranians with hacking US computers

Officials: Suspects not in custody, but are limited

Bart Jansen
USA TODAY

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department announced Wednesday charges against three Iranian men accused of hacking into hundreds of U.S. computer systems, encrypting data and extorting people for ransom.

Victims of the scheme included a township in Union County, New Jersey, and a county government in Wyoming; accounting firms in New Jersey and Illinois; power companies in Indiana and Mississippi; a Washington state housing authority; and a Pennsylvania domestic violence shelter, according to the indictment.

The three are in Iran and are not in custody. But officials familiar with the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said the charges are intended to limit their employment, training and travel outside Iran, and they could be tried if ever taken into custody. The indictment doesn’t implicate the Iranian government.

FBI Director Christopher Wray said hackers might feel safe in anonymity behind their keyboards, but they are wrong and can be identified.

“The FBI is coming after them, and we’re doing it with the full force of our law enforcement and intelligence partners in the U.S. and overseas,” Wray said. “These three individuals are among a group of cybercriminals whose attacks represent a direct assault on critical infrastructure and public services we all depend on.”

The charges come as the Justice Department bolsters its investigations involving cybersecurity and ransomware against what officials warned business executives in June 2021 could be an exponential increase in hacking attacks. Then, the department announced it had recovered the majority of $4.4 million extorted from Colonial Pipeline in a ransomware attack, which hindered fuel deliveries. In November 2021, the department announced charges against two Russians who are accused of writing and unleashing ransomware.

The Iranian suspects named in the indictment are Mansour Admadi, Ahmad Khatibi Aghda and Amir Hossein Nickaein Ravari. The four counts charged in the indictment are conspiracy to commit fraud in connection with computers, two counts of intentionally damaging a protected computer and transmitting a demand in relation to damaging a computer.

The scheme ran from October 2020 to August 2022. In some cases, the victims paid ransoms in bitcoin. Federal authorities haven’t recovered the bitcoin or frozen any bitcoin accounts, as they have in other cases in recent years. Officials couldn’t estimate how much total was extorted.
